Characteristics of mandibular angulation in high and low-angle adolescent Class II cases. This study aimed to determine the characteristics of mandibular angulation in high and low-angle Class II adolescent cases. The cephalometric radiographs of 757 adolescent males and females were selected and divided into three groups: class II high-angle (≥32°), class II low-angle (≤30°), and normal (31°-43°). The anteroposterior and vertical measurements of the mandible and angulation were measured and analysed. The distribution of angle classifications in the present sample was as follows: 21.8% normal angle, 18.3% class I low-angle, 44.8% class II high-angle, and 14.5% class II low-angle. The mean values of A'-Sn' in the high-angle group were significantly greater than those in the normal group. There were no significant differences in the values of Ls'. Within the high-angle group, Class II types showed significantly greater values of A'-Sn' than did Class III types. The percentage of teeth in the occlusal category was statistically significantly higher in the Class III group than in the Class II group, whereas the percentage of teeth in the labial category was significantly greater in the Class II group than in the Class III group. When the normal range was applied to each group, 77.3% and 82.8% of the class II high-angle group and class II low-angle group, respectively, had normal mandibular angulation. The ratio of abnormal mandibular angulation was significantly higher in the class III high-angle group than in the class III low-angle group. The combination of cervical vertebral maturation stages B1-B2 or B1-B3 in class II high-angle cases was higher than that in class II low-angle cases. In the majority of high-angle Class II adolescent cases, the mandible can be considered to be normal. In the rare cases of Class II high-angle cases in which the mandible exhibits abnormal angulation, there is the potential for premature closure of the mandibular duct or severe mandibular prognathism.Q: Method for converting string to object in.Net I have a method which takes the string as an input parameter and based on the format of the string the output will be expected in a specific format. if
