Characterization of the response of the bovine endothelial cell to in vivo and in vitro growth factor stimulation. Tissue culture media is currently used as an experimental model to explore the potential responses of endothelium to cytokines. In this study, the response of cultured bovine endothelial cells to the in vivo effects of tumor necrosis factor alpha (TNF alpha) and insulin-like growth factor I (IGF-I) were compared. It was determined that incubation of endothelial cells with TNF alpha resulted in a fourfold increase in prostacyclin (PGI2) secretion relative to control cultures (1320 vs. 270 pg/mL PGI2; p less than 0.001). Incubation with either TNF alpha or insulin-like growth factor I stimulated protein synthesis and DNA replication by 25%. Incubation with either TNF alpha or insulin-like growth factor I increased the levels of mRNA for endothelial nitric oxide synthase (eNOS) by 2.6- and 2.1-fold, respectively. TNF alpha treatment significantly increased the overall rate of mRNA degradation. Autoradiographic studies of [35S]methionine/cysteine-labeled cultures revealed that TNF alpha treatment accelerated the transit of ribosomes through polysomes of eNOS mRNA approximately twofold compared with controls. These results demonstrate that primary cultures of bovine endothelial cells respond to the in vivo effects of cytokines by increasing synthesis of eNOS and release of PGI2.
