Huge explosion and fire in Harbin in China. Picture. Damien Meyer/Flickr CC In a new report, Amnesty International and Environmental Rights Action Canada note that the government has made false promises about pollution standards in the region, without even close to their original targets being met. The two groups suggest that China needs to be transparent about its industrial pollution and that the public has a right to know about it. They also say that China needs to go after the polluters with far more force, including new laws and stricter sanctions. The report points out that at least 23 industrial factories in China have been known to dump untreated or partially treated sewage into lakes, rivers and canals. The water pollution is only getting worse, as more factories open and new construction occurs. In an effort to clean up the water supply, the government has put forth new rules to promote environmental protection in 2010. The people who live in the areas of water pollution across the country, however, have seen little change. "China needs a major overhaul of its national water pollution control system and must immediately adopt measures to deal with serious environmental pollution," says He Qiang, China researcher at Amnesty International. "China is highly vulnerable to climate change and water shortages, and its pollution control system needs an urgent overhaul. All levels of government must urgently establish national mechanisms and take urgent measures to effectively monitor pollution, implement new environmental protection measures, and improve environmental protection," He Qiang says. In some cases, the sewage is mixed with industrial waste before it is released into the environment. In other cases, the water comes from sewage leaking into rivers. According to the Amnesty and Environmental Rights Action Canada, the lack of transparency at the national level has made it impossible to effectively identify pollution as it's happening. In 2009, the government was concerned about growth of populations in parts of the country that had

We measured the distribution of neuronal and endothelial nitric oxide synthase (nNOS and eNOS, respectively) in the developing brain of the rhesus monkey. Immunohistochemical localization of the enzymes was detected from 90 days of gestation (dg) through 3 months of age. Cytoplasmic immunoreactivity was found in a variable pattern of neurons, neuroglial cells and endothelial cells. There was relatively little difference between the distribution of nNOS and eNOS in the brain during the period studied. An exception was the anterior part of the hypothalamus, where the nNOS-immunoreactive neurons were found to have a quite different distribution pattern from the eNOS-immunoreactive cells. Our results indicate that the nitric oxide (NO) pathway, both in neurons and in the endothelium, is activated in the first few months of life. The neurons that are immunoreactive for nNOS appear to be significantly less reactive for eNOS than those that are reactive for eNOS. There are, however, no apparent differences in the distribution of the two enzymes between different brain regions, with the exception of the anterior part of the hypothalamus
