Download Fluke Networks OptiView Series III Portable Network Analyzer with FT500 Fiber Inspector Mini Video Microscope, Fiber Tester How to apply the classification method for categorical features in Kafka Streams? I have the following Spark code to classify a given kafka record as a "good" or "bad" using the code from this blog: However, because I have a bunch of categorical features, I figured there might be a classifier that works best for this situation. The code is modified from the above link as follows:

KafkaSerDe.serdeFromProperties(sparkConf, Map("input.topic" -> "kafka_streams", "value.class" ->
    "java.util.ArrayList", "value.deserializer" ->
    "org.apache.kafka.common.serialization.Serdes$StructSerde", "key.deserializer" ->
    "org.apache.kafka.common.serialization.Serdes$stringSerde")) .select("key","value")
    .map(line=>(line.getString(0),line.getObject(1))) .reduce( (data1,data2) => {
        if(data2.getValue.size()==0){

Fluke Networks LAN MapShot® .Cold atom relaxation in a strongly detuned optical lattice. We present an experimental study of cold atom relaxation processes in a strongly detuned optical lattice. The excitation of the atomic ground state by a weak excitation pulse leads to a train of ultra-short period optical pulses propagating along the lattice axis. We observe the presence of multiple-atom excitations within the lattice: the first-order excitation at the beginning of a pulse triggers the excitation of additional atoms through second-order Bragg scattering. We find that the relaxation of the atomic ensemble through multiple excitations is enhanced by the presence of the lattice and that the strength of the nonlinear response depends on the lattice depth. As a result, an optimal lattice depth is shown to induce multiple-atom excitations with a large yield of excited atoms and a high selectivity of the scattered light. Finally, we show that the lattice height can be maintained stable during the relaxation process, thus demonstrating the coherence of the lattice and the possibility to steer the atomic relaxation.
