So, this guy had the problem that he believed if he had a puppy, he would have no puppy. Also that there was a puppy. I wrote out a solution, took the boolean, and then drew the solution in LISP. That was apparently a fun Friday. Michael is the idealistic son of a Mafia Don. He begins the story without a set future because he insists he will not follow in his fathers footsteps and is thus uncertain about what he may do. As time goes by, however, he finds himself naturally inclined to getting involved in solving his familys business related problems. Soon he is a murderer. He continues to deny that he has truly become a murderer until it almost becomes a joke. When he has his brother-in-law murdered, his sister accuses him of arranging it so that his whole family hears. This forces him to lie to his wifes face that he is innocent and then pronounce her forbidden from ever asking about his business again. In doing so, he as much as proclaims that his business is murder. Ummmm... There are millions of people that have adopted "us" and "them" thinking. I think they are people of high intelligence, some well versed in philosophy, psychology, theology, politics, history, etc. They are people who have mental problems (low or high functioning). They can still have tremendous strengths in common sense, physical strength, and interpersonal communication. People who have major problems, generally cannot be "helped" and who "need" "other" people to tell them what to do, what to think, what to say, etc. You think that people who are "Narcissistic" get the reasoning that all men are equal, no one is greater than the other, and all are equal? You think that people who are mentally ill cannot make those little factual mistakes and oversights? Is your system for thinking really for "everyone"?

Also, life is hard, you can never fight all kinds of crazy people all the time. The fact that there are all kinds of crazy people out there means that there are all kinds of crazy people in our midst. Even the smart people are sometimes idiots. And as the old adage goes, you cannot fight city hall. If you can, if you can fight and beat the crazy people, if you can fight and prevail, well, then you become just another crazy person, and the problems will never end. And you'll never get a life, or any kind of happiness. This kind of study isn't easy. Even though Meretoux promises it, the history of psychology is littered with the remains of many failed attempts to study something as complex as human beings. The typical experiment involves a researcher asking a person to do something. The researcher then judges the results by noting the results. In field studies like this, for example, someone might ask someone on the street to guess how many fingers the researcher is holding up. This rarely works, and rarely makes sense. People may be more or less susceptible to certain kinds of studies depending on their mood, their expectations, their current problems, their ability to follow instructions, and probably a bunch of other things. (You may see some of these flaws in the experiments listed below. Other problems with psychological research are discussed in this article on the r/AskScience subreddit. If you find this topic interesting, you may also enjoy this short episode of AskScience where researchers were interviewed about how they found their studies to be unreliable.)
