A confidential report to the Home Office obtained by the Guardian reveals a huge, three-year child abuse inquiry was launched into domestic violence in the BNP years, but was abandoned at the very last minute amid concerns that someone could be named. An internal report written in 2004 by a senior Home Office official warns that, in coming months, hundreds of cases of sexual, physical and psychological abuse of children will come to light, with one male abuser "specifically targeting" young BNP members as victims. It says the way some of these cases have come to light suggests a child has been groomed and abused by members of the party, usually in the social and family milieu. In the aftermath of Stephen Lawrence's murder in 1993, the government launched a major inquiry into police response to knife crime. This was prompted by the shooting death of a 15-year-old boy in Sussex named Stephen Barker. Among the findings of the resulting MacPherson report was that the Metropolitan police's tactics had been at times insensitive. Home Office papers show that, in December 2003, the then home secretary, David Blunkett, was told of two cases of child abuse in the BNP. One involved girls being forced to perform sexual acts on men, and the other was of a child being sexually assaulted and forced to be a page at the party's annual conference. Blunkett was also told a second report had found that there were cases where non-BNP perpetrators were abusing children, and the party should monitor this. The official reports showed that, in some cases, the abuse had happened years before, or had been passed off as a "friendship" relationship. But Blunkett decided there was no need for further inquiry, and all involved parties, including the police, were told this. The revelations about BNP child abuse emerged shortly after the party was suspended by the Electoral Commission for fielding 279 councillors who had committed electoral fraud or had been suspended from office for similar reasons. A second inquiry,
